There's a beached whale graveyard level in this game. If that doesn't sell you on it, what's wrong with you?

Okay, technically, orcas are a species of dolphin, not whale. But still. It's awesome.

Most bullet hell shmups lack a compelling dynamic. The entire game is "navigate your tiny hitbox through a ludicrous sea of bullets." Not that that's bad but it's nice to have something to interesting added to the mix. Ikaruga did a good job of that with its duality mechanic. This game does a good job with its expand/contract mechanic.

As you accumulate ships in your little fleet, you're going to want to expand them so they sprawl across the screen. The reason is because it generates a massive, powerful stream of bullets that makes you more than just a sum of your ships. The catch: You're also covering more screen space and risk getting thrashed by the bullet hell quicker. It's a fun trade-off to mix-up the otherwise rote "just git gud" aspect of bullet hell shmups.

Complaints:

- I thought the Normal mode was too easy but the difficulty spikes _way_ up there for the Serious mode.
- The scrolling background repeats a little too much. It would be nice to get more variety.
- The game's pretty short

For the price I paid (on sale for $6 in some bundle), this game is well worth the money.
